WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

- A river of moist air is forecast to spread east across northwest California Monday and Tuesday. This will favor periods of moderate to heavy rain over the region.
- Unseasonably high temperatures are expected late this week as offshore flow develops beneath a building ridge of high pressure. The hottest locations will likely be in the Los Angeles and Ventura County Valleys.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

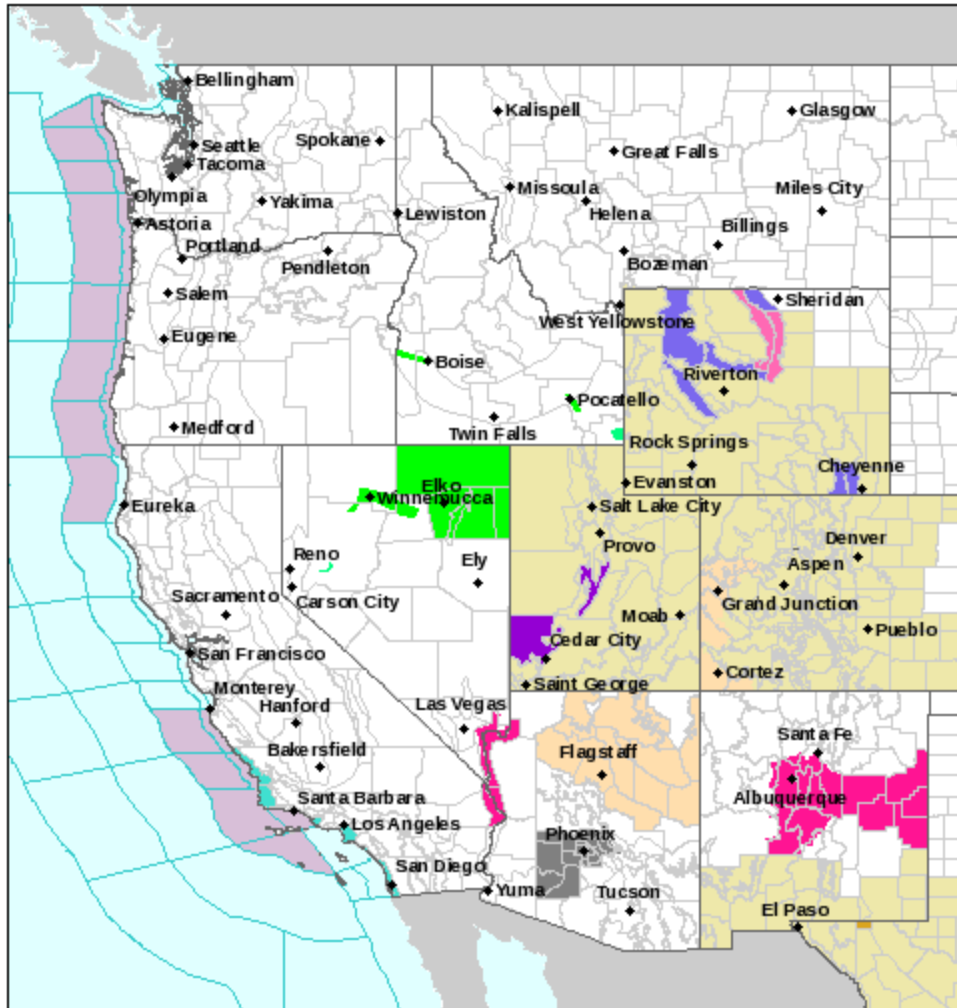

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

High pressure will be over Northern California today and produce sunny, warm, and dry weather today. Another trough will reach the west coast on Saturday and produce cool and breezy weather with partly to mostly cloudy skies. A few showers are possible in far northern areas late Saturday through Sunday. A third system will bring periods of light rain to most of the region Monday through next Thursday. Beyond that it looks like a few days of warm and dry weather with occasional gusty N-NE winds.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Gusty north winds occurred in a few locations early this morning such as the Interstate 5 Corridor and interior sections of Ventura and Orange Counties. Wind speeds were generally 15-25 mph with some gusts to 45 mph. The Cleveland National Forest and areas near Highway 126 in Ventura County will see northeast winds of 10-20 mph with gusts to 45 mph before all winds dropped off by late afternoon. The Colorado River Valley will see north winds of 15-25 mph with gusts to 40 mph throughout the day. Strong sunshine coupled with the offshore flow will send temperatures climbing 8-12 degrees over yesterday's readings. Highs will reach the upper 80s to the mid 90s in the valleys and lower foothills today and Saturday with readings well into the 70s in the mountains below 6,000 feet. A pair of weak troughs to our north will cause onshore flow and cooler weather to resume Sunday through the end of next week. Highs will drop back into the 70s in the valleys by next Monday or Tuesday with some marine layer coverage sneaking back to the lower coastal slopes during the night and morning hours. Gusty northwest winds up to 40 mph will be possible Sunday along the Central Coast and the Kern County Mountains eastward into the high desert.
